Introduction 3 seen, by contrast with the tree diagrams which are found so often in linguistics textbooks and which are associated with the representation of structure from a logical dependency perspective, the structural representations used in systemically orientated syntactic analyses present a much flatter appearance. In systemic linguistics the grammar or linguistic system of a language itself is seen as comprising three levels or strata: the semantic stratum, the lexicogrammatical stratum and the phonological (or graphological) stratum. The semantics account for the structure and patterning of the different components of linguistic meaning of a text and, reflecting the different functions which language fulfils, are normally seen as constituting the grammar's generative base.
