We all know that history is the study of the past and that the tradition of writing history was established by the Greeks. When combined, however, these trivial assertions do not constitute a joint truth, since for the Greeks writing history was not in fact a study of the past. A Greek historian published an account of notable events. The growing interest of historians in studying all important areas of a given society certainly has something to do with the growing complexity of contemporary European society and the related emergence of a more complex view on how societies function.

History is a study of the various facts of human life and is closely linked with other social sciences which make a specific study of different facts of human life. Many scholars held a view that history is the centre of the social sciences which feeds other social sciences. History and Political Science— Historian work would be mere fiction unless he uses the discoveries of modern psychology. The personal life and the environment of a historian has a direct bearing in his decision and often import a bias to his account and renders the much desired objectivity impossible. The impact of psychology on history is evident from the fact that in the past historian inquired primarily into the origins of war and ignored the result of war. History, however, is the study of the past. Given all the demands that press in from living in the present and anticipating what is yet to come, why bother with what has been? Given all the desirable and available branches of knowledge, why insist-as most American educational programs do-on a good bit of history? And why urge many students to study even more history than they are required to? Any subject of study needs justification: its advocates must explain why it is worth attention.— In addition, modern historians frequently ask questions about our past in order to better understand our present. Historians use a wide range of methods in their attempt to answer their questions about what happened to our distant and not so distant ancestors. With history already well written up, the current mass of people doing historical studies at university and then trying to write something as theses, papers and publications, and finding the ground well covered, these modern historians have to cook up new versions, mostly distortions but occasionally with new insight, to publish and sell to modern readers.— The Old Kingdom and the Middle Kingdom are the first two major periods that modern historians have divided Egypt into. The third is the New Kingdom. Asked in Manga.
