Common Memo Writing Situations. Memos are used in a variety of workplace communication situations, from documentation of procedures and policies to simple announcements. Below are some common types of memos: Policies (changes and new).^Â In cases such as this, writers should consider three factors: the nature of the message, the depth/number of its details, and its likelihood of being printed for easier reference. These types of messages should be written up in memo format and attached to an email message for fast (and environmentally friendly) distribution: Messages that have an official aura, such as new policies or revisions of policies. Messages containing much detail (such as instructions on how to calibrate a complicated piece of machinery).

These strategies come from many backgrounds including psychological research, communications research, and successful practitioners' experiences. From all of this, I have distilled 6 groups of strategies that you can apply in your own writing! They begin with analysis and then continue with 5 groups of techniques. An opposite situation occurs when introducing a new product that might be rejected because of its strangeness. In both situations, there is a heavy use of metaphor and analogy to either create new perspectives or, as in the second case, give a comfortable, familiar aura to strange new products. How, you might wonder, do these strategies apply to adding human interest to eLearning content?
