For "old Middle East hands" and newcomers alike, American Presidents and the Middle East is the best available overview of the period that began with the 1945-1946 Iran-Azerbaijan crisis handled by President Truman and ended with the Reagan administration's indirect support for the Iraqi side in the latter part of the Iran-Iraq war of 1980-1988. There is real drama in many of the crises examined by Lenczowski. Presidents, it has been said, are the only American political leaders with any real power, and Middle East problems repeatedly have tested that power. Given the extreme size American trade with the Middle East dates back more than two hundred years. In fact, commercial contacts between Smyrna (an ancient city in Turkey) and Boston began as early as 1767, when Smyrna products (most notably figs) and spices were appealing to the Middle East. In addition, President Woodrow Wilson's concept of "self-determination" of nations was essential and supportive to the rights of peoples to decide to have their own political destiny.

THE SELF-DEFEATING passivity of President Obama's policies in the Middle East may have reached its apotheosis earlier this month at a National Security Council meeting that he chaired. On the table were options for responding to the bloody and criminal assault on the Syrian city of Aleppo, including grounding the Syrian air force with missile or air strikes, or supplying more advanced weapons to CIA-backed rebels. In the end, Mr. Obama chose neither to approve nor reject the measures; instead, he decided not to decide. In short, what's needed is a president who recognizes the need for American leadership in the Middle East. In This Review. American Presidents And The Middle East. American Presidents And The Middle East. By George Lenczowski. Duke University Press, 1989, 321 pp. $40.00 Purchase. Professor Lenczowski, a veteran scholar and observer of Middle East affairs, has taken the subject of U.S. policy and chopped it up into segments representing the terms of office of eight presidents from Truman to Reagan. The treatment is necessarily general and is based on published presidential memoirs and other familiar material, but the author adds some sharp views of his own and he does highlight the differences in at The Middle East Policy Council (MEPC) is a Washington, D.C.-based 501(c)3 non-profit organization that produces analysis and commentary on issues impacting U.S. national interests in the Middle East. It was founded in 1981 under the stated mission to "expand public discussion and understanding of issues affecting U.S. policy in the Middle East.". MEPC was originally named the American Arab Affairs Council and was co-founded by journalist Richard Curtiss, who later founded the Washington Report on
