Whether looking for information or entertainment, products or soulmates, we are relying more on dynamic searches than on stable sources. Search pervasively affects our view of the Internet and, increasingly, of "real life". Search engines host billions of queries per day. They "answer" more and more of them without the asker ever having to click through to another site. I've spent a good deal of the past decade thinking about how law could make our black box society more transparent. I've proposed "fair reputation reporting" to help people understand the stories data miners tell about them. I've promoted a "Federal Search Commission" to monitor how search engines are ranking and rating people and companies. I've contributed ideas to several meetings of finance transparency activists.
