On PC, paying customers get CD-quality music; non-payers get lower-quality tracks and audio ads every half hour. You simply download a small application to your computer, sign up with a username, then launch the application to listen - and it plays in the background while you work. Whether you pay or not, it's a sensational service that lets you fast-forward and pause, build playlists and share them with friends. Spotify submitted the application to Apple for approval late in July. Understandably, the music and technology giant has taken time to decide whether or not Spotify is a direct threat to its own iTunes Store, which has sold six billion tracks since its launch in 2003.

Pay the Piper Spell Jar. Here's a spell for those times when you're waiting on payment from a variety of different sources for work you've already done. It's money drawing with modified intentions, since you know who owes you and for what. (In my case, a freelance article, music royalties, and a supplies trade.) The calcite can rest against the outside. If you like, draw or pierce a money-drawing sigil on the bay leaf before adding it. Tie green ribbon around your jar and anoint your tealight with bergamot oil, if applicable. You can also sprinkle mint on top of the tealight.

I saw that she was so concentrated on her beautiful music, and I was able to strike. My heart knew it was wrong, but my stomach growled and my mind thought of all the things I could use it for. To make money. Possible meaning: The person who pays a musician can decide what music he wants to hear. And the person who pays for any service has the right to say exactly what he wants. Note: piper (noun) = a person who plays the pipe (a musical instrument) | tune (noun) = a melody; a piece of music.

Quick Quiz. Mark tapped his wallet and said to his friends, "He who pays the piper calls the tune", meaning that.

- he wondered if they'd like to go to a concert.
- he would decide where they would eat.
- he'd spent all his money.

b. a) he wondered if they'd like to go to a concert

Live music is one of the few businesses in which second-hand goods often sell for more than new ones. "As soon as a show sells out, front-row seats appear on the web for $600," says Rob Hallett of AEG Live. Tickets to see musicians such as Bruce Springsteen, who insists that entry to his shows be cheap enough for working stiffs to afford, are particularly susceptible to what fans call "price gouging" and an economist would call price discovery. Outfits such as Ticketmaster have tried to capture some of this huge secondary market by setting up ticket exchanges. But this leaves fans confused and Paying the Piper is a 1949 Looney Tunes cartoon starring Porky Pig. It is a parody of the fairy tale The Pied Piper and it involves Porky trying to stop a cat that disguises himself as the last rat to bring the rats back for the local cats, and later, to get the reward money back from the cat, by playing a clarinet.
